Ca<sup>2+</sup> concentration is associated with the production of nitric oxide by LPSstimulated microglia. The ability of microglia to produce nitric oxide (NO) plays an important role in many aspects of the inflammatory response.
However, the mechanisms by which microglia induce the release of NO after LPS stimulation are still unclear. In this study, we investigated changes in intracellular Ca<sup>2+</sup> concentration during NO release from LPS-stimulated rat microglia. We also measured the production of NO from LPS-stimulated microglia after incubation with thapsigargin, LaCl<sub>3</sub> or cyclopiazonic acid. LPS-induced an increase in intracellular Ca<sup>2+</sup> concentration, which was reduced after pretreatment with thapsigargin, LaCl<sub>3</sub> or cyclopiazonic acid. After 2-5 min of LPS stimulation, NO release was observed, which was followed by a further increase in Ca<sup>2+</sup> concentration. These results indicate that the increase in intracellular Ca<sup>2+</sup> concentration
